Digging For Dollars

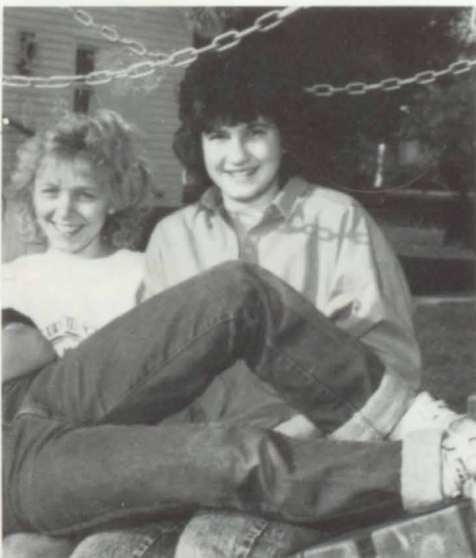

Imagine getting ready for the clock to strike 10:00 p.m. Time to hit the sack? NO! Time to grab your boots and shovel, start looking for a slippery pile of nightcrawlers, and start digging. While Josh Follett is on the job, those crafty little critters don't stand a chance. In case you don't already know, this young man has found a way to turn a rather disgusting job into a profitable business.

Josh has kept these slimy invertebrates on their toes for three years now. You may think it's funny, but $100 a summer is nothing to laugh at.

Don't get the wrong idea. It's not all fun and games. He picks approximately twenty dozen of those squishy pink yum-yums. He says it's tiring work because it has to be done at night. Josh's work does have its ups and downs, but he says the greatest damage is due to destroyed merchandise. Worms sometimes get sucked back down into the earth or even break, if not handled properly.

The survivors are packed away in a little refrigerator to await fate.

Though he won't become filthy rich, Josh enjoys hunting the worms, and he certainly appreciates the extra cash. He has provided a valuable service for area fishermen, even if the worms don't like him.
