Close-Knit Families

Teams Develop Into People You Count On

When playing on sporting teams, you shouldn't be in it just for yourself. When you're on a team, everyone counts on everyone else. You're a group who helps one another play their best.

No matter what players do during a game, someone else has helped them. When players shoot the ball and score a couple of points, who was it that passed them the ball, or taught them how to shoot in the first place? The players' family, their team, did.

In basketball, you can't play without your "family." You need someone to pass you the ball, tell you what you're doing wrong, or try to relax you before an important free throw. The boys used their team family in many ways. Every time Larry Litwiller took a shot, his team was waiting for a rebound, just in case it didn't go in. The girls took turns inviting the team over for supper before home games. Just like real families and that's what they were.
