What do we really pull ourselves out of bed for on a Monday morning? Is it the fact that we know we're headed to school to learn about WWI or to dissect a frog — maybe even a cat?

What most of us come to school for at 8:30 a.m. every weekday is to see our friends. To share a laugh. To tell them the biggest secret we have. Whispering through the halls to our best friends about the "new item" that just walked by. Sitting out in the parking lot, chatting with one another or playing football on the football field during lunch. Some of us seem to gather in the library before school even begins. We tell Mary our problems, the guys watch sports on ESPN and the sound of country music makes it way through the room.

That's what — after all — school is really about ... making memories with high school friends. Another one of those things that will never change.
