

PARTY TIME?

Partying Isn't The Only Thing
The Journalism Class Knows How To Do
Working Tops The List
Designing And Producing A Yearbook
Is The Main Goal They Meet Every Year

Writing the copy. Capturing the moment. Selling the ads. Designing the graphics. This is in part, the profile of the journalism class.

Working together and under tight deadlines are familiar activities for the journalism class. In fact, several journalism students said meeting deadlines was the hardest part of the class.

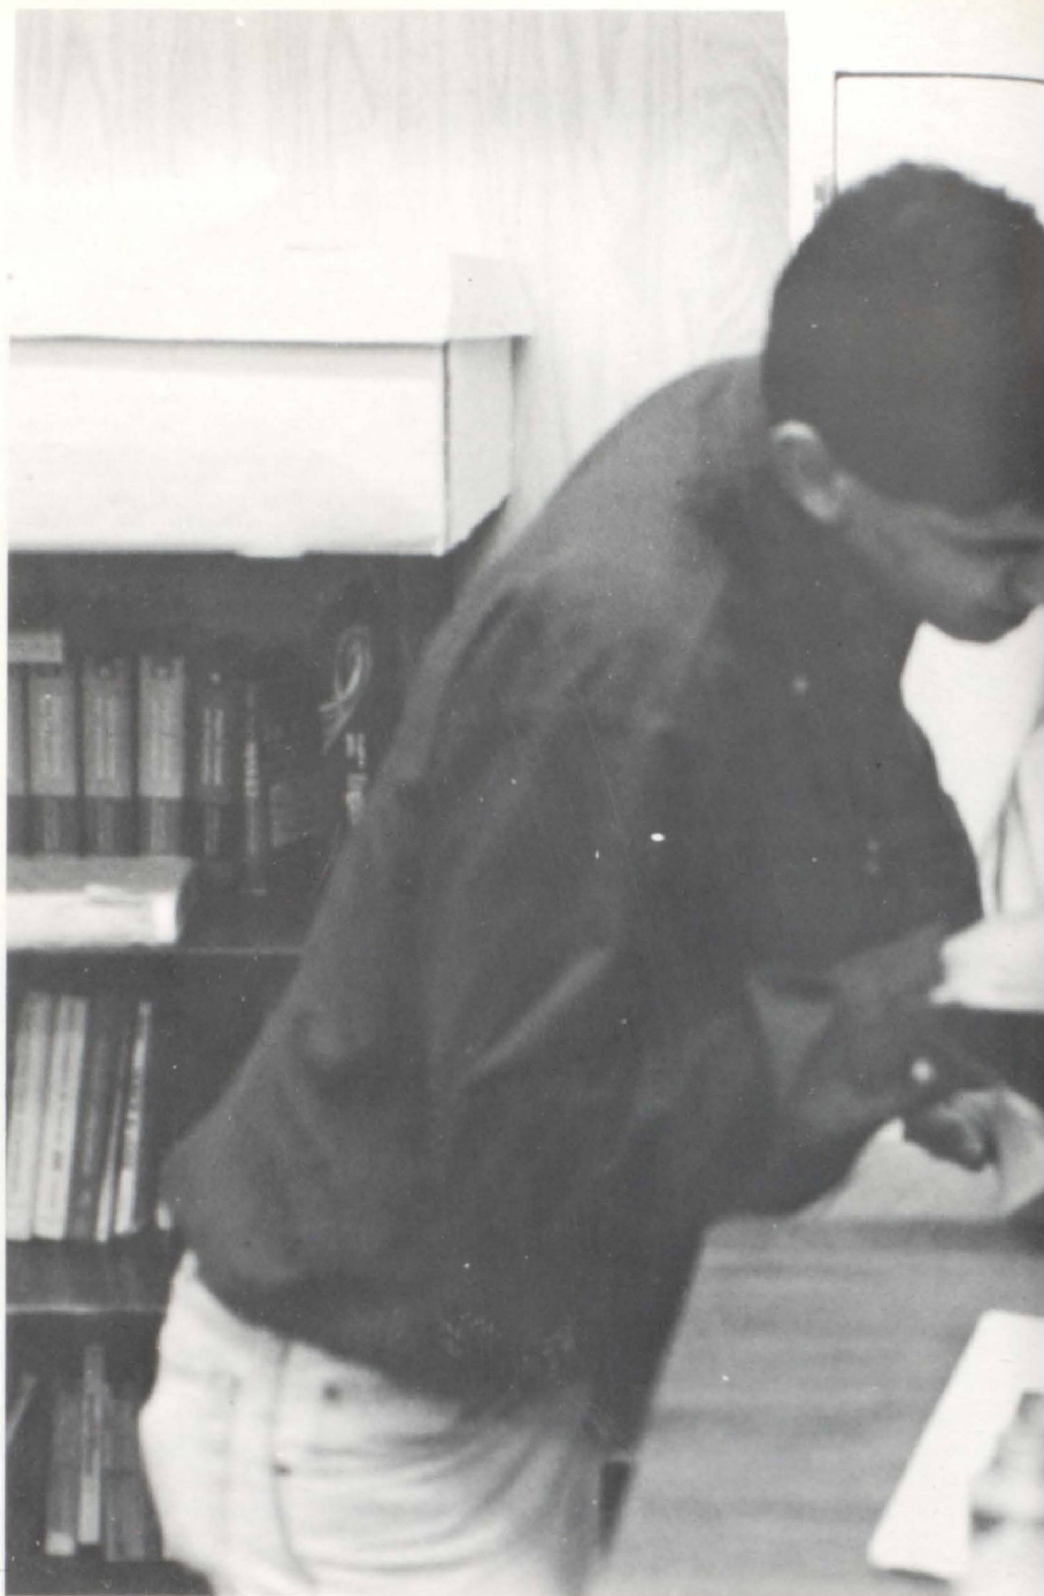

"We always have a deadline to meet," Brianna Yelsik said. "It doesn't matter if we have something to do the night before, the work still has to be done."

"The deadlines will help us all prepare for college," Jenny Powelson said. "Its been hard work, but we know when the yearbook is completed, we'll be satisfied."

But the yearbook wasn't all hard work and stress. They also had time to take a breather and jaunt off to the vending machine as a reward for their efforts.

Mrs. Suzanne Luneack reflected, "The students get treats for all their time and hard work."

Jaime Morris

J. Morris

WHERE'S THE WHITEOUT? Joe Beracy and Brianna Yelsik type yearbook stories. Journalism staffers wore a steady path between Mrs. L's room and the computer room.

Journalism Staff Left side: Stephanie Thiel, Jenny Powelson, Stephanie Murdock, Joe Beracy, Dominic Lowe, Angie Brzak On the ground: Chris Porter, Jamie Contreras, Kim Contreras, Sara McGillis, Mrs. Suzanne Luneack Right side: Shannan Felton, Jaime Morris, JoAnna Thompson, Brianna Yelsik.