SADD Organization stresses to students drinking and driving has serious negative effects.

by Melissa Bornemann

Is one night of fun worth a lifetime of loss? SADD (Students Against Drinking and Driving) planned a week of activities before prom to answer this question. During an assembly, a Michigan State policeman talked to students, speeches and a poem were read, a wrecked truck was displayed, and throughout the day students were chosen to be "dead" and laid out across the gym floor.

All these examples of the result of drinking and driving proved to be very effective with students. Dave Polash commented, "The activities we had during the week changed my attitude about drinking and driving." Students realized what drinking and driving can do to them and soaked up every bit of information given to them during SADD week.
