Until We Meet Again

You're in a small, well lit room with all your fellow classmates that you would recognize as your friends. You are remembering how small they all were and how quickly years flew. When looking at all their faces, you realize that this could be the last hour, the last minute, maybe even the last second you will be spending with each and every one of them.

It's then when everything around you seems to be moving so fast, but you appear to be still. You try and try to catch up, but you only seem to be getting further and further away. Everything is moving too quick and the time is running out. You don't want this to be the end of friendships you've encountered and you're not ready to give up the everyday routine you've been doing for the past thirteen years. But, the time is moving too quick and the night is almost over when you realize that you're not saying good bye to everything and everyone you've grown accustomed to, this is just the beginning and you're only saying "see ya later."
